The Last Day and the Day After.

Kansas Building, Fairmount Park, }
9 p. m., November 11, 1876. }
Last day morning opened raw and damp, chilly and gloomy. We were all up early, heard the big guns booming their last salute, and struck out over the grounds in a shiver to feed and take a last look before the opening hour. All the lawns where a view of the fireworks were to be had the night before were muddy, and the grass gone by the tramping of $00,000 that had paid a quarter each to get in; scraps of paper, chunks of lunch, pieces of dry goods and clothing, relics of wrecked hoop-looking things, empty old wallets, etc., strewed the ground, and at dayaway. In front of the Main building the workmen were busy on the staging to hold the functionaries while they put a stopper to the big show. As oon as the gates were opened there was a steady human stream entering the grounds until 176,060 had deposited their change in the gate boxes. About 10 a. m. it sprinkled, then bersons, managed to squeeze in a hundred cleared a little, then rained with variations until night; the programme that was to be carried out on the large stagng was impossible in the rain, and out one out of every hundred got nto Judges Hall, where, standing outside in the rain, we heard faintly Thomas' Orchestra, and that's all we know about the closing exercises, except that we got wet and muddy, and, of course we induced all who could be spared at the Kausas Building to go exercise and a little damp. All day long the crowd in our building was jam, jammer, jammest. Such crowding and crushing we never had, except on "Penusylvania Day," though al-ways more crowded than any other Single and Double Teams furnished on short about the display, and it could not be put up for the crowd. Children velling and almost crushed were lifted out of the dense pack and passed over the heads of people to a safe place. The crush kept up until it was too dark to see. Among the lost in the building was an Irishman, who, looking at the apple dome, the twilighted, luminous,
